

Buy-sell agreements

Ensuring the continuity of your business

Buy-sell agreements help ensure the smooth continuation of your business after a potentially disruptive event, such as the death of a partner.

A buy-sell agreement is a legally binding contract that, when exercised, allows a business entity, shareholder, or partner to purchase an interest in the business when an owner leaves or dies. Typically, buy-sell agreements specify when, to whom, and at what price an interest in the business will be sold.

Before you set up a buy-sell agreement, you should consult a tax advisor and attorney for guidance on your unique situation. To work as intended, buy-sell agreements must be drafted carefully.

Benefits of a buy-sell agreement

When properly structured, buy-sell agreements can help ensure a smooth transition for and continuation of your business. A buy-sell agreement may be a good fit if you have a specific business succession strategy in mind, or if you want to prevent outsiders from getting control of your business.

Having a buy-sell agreement may also be reassuring to your creditors, customers, and employees. Such an agreement could even help safeguard the value of your business and support its entity status (if your company is an S corporation or a limited liability company, for example).

In some cases, buy-sell agreements may also help prevent unexpected estate-tax consequences upon the business owner's death. Buy-sell agreements allow you to fix the purchase price as the estate-tax value of a deceased owner's business interest, which may help you avoid future valuation problems with the IRS.

Though it's designed as a contingency strategy, YOU SHOULD PLAN YOUR BUY-SELL AGREEMENT IN DETAIL.

Setting up the buy-sell agreement

Your attorney might advise that to be valid, buy-sell agreements must clearly specify the conditions under which the interest in the business will be sold. This includes listing events that will trigger the buy-sell agreement, such as:

- Death of a business owner
- Retirement, resignation, or termination of a partner or shareholder
- Long-term disability
- Legal, personal, or financial problems

After you've determined the "trigger events," you'll need to establish a purchase price. An independent business valuator can help you determine the fair market value of your business.

Although it may be tempting to guess at a figure or skip this step, it's critical in preventing potential disputes or unintended tax consequences down the road. Also, keep in mind that valuations may need to be updated periodically.

Small firms comprise approximately 98 percent of all U.S. employers and provide jobs to over 40 million people, or 35 percent of the U.S. workforce.¹

To be successful, there must be funds available to carry out the terms of a buy-sell agreement.

Although a buy-sell agreement is usually a contingency strategy, you should consider how you and your business partner(s) would be able to execute the agreement, if needed. Without a funding strategy in place, the buyer(s) could be forced to take out a loan, sell assets, or perhaps even declare bankruptcy.

Fortunately, there are several ways to fund a buy-sell agreement, such as using cash, redeeming stock, or drafting an installment note. Depending on the size of your business – and your liquid assets – one of these options could be a good choice.

But if you don't have the necessary funds, there is another option you can consider.

Fixed index universal life insurance (FIUL) can give you and your business partners death benefit protection, to help address business continuation needs and the surviving family's needs for income, final expenses, estate taxes, and debt replacement. Depending on your situation, an FIUL may be a good choice to fund your buy-sell agreement, allowing the remaining business owner to buy the company interests of a co-owner's share, if he or she were to die, at a previously agreed-upon price.

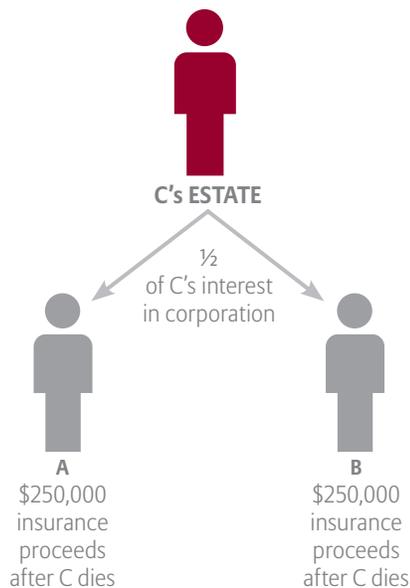

Since life insurance is an underwritten product, any strategy that includes it is contingent on the health underwriting and in some cases, financial underwriting of the insured.

Two ways that life insurance can fund the buy-sell agreement

Cross-purchase agreement: Each business owner buys a life insurance policy on the other shareholders. Upon the death of the first owner, the remaining shareholders receive the death benefit from the life insurance policy(ies).

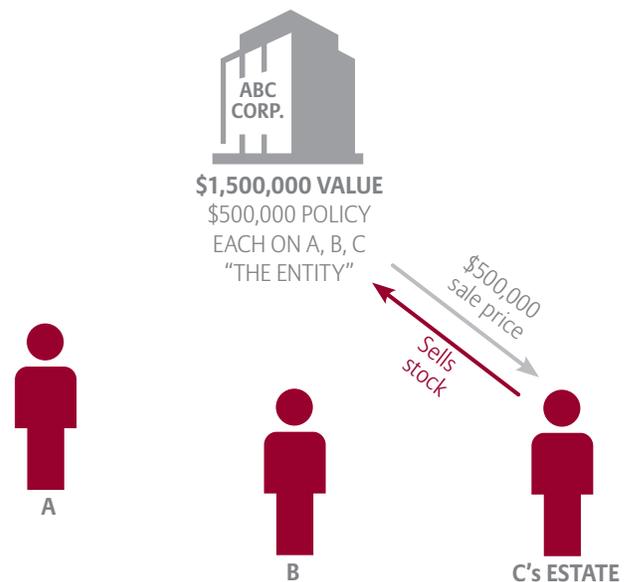

In this hypothetical example,¹ the ABC Corp is valued at $1,500,000. Shareholders A, B, and C each have a one-third ownership of $500,000 in the business. Each shareholder buys a $250,000 life insurance policy on the other two (so, in total, six policies are purchased). If shareholder C were to pass away, shareholders A and B would each use the death benefit from their $250,000 policies on C's life to buy out C's interest in the corporation.

Entity purchase (stock redemption) agreement:

This may be more appropriate for larger companies that have more shareholders. In an entity purchase agreement, the business purchases only one policy per owner. Upon death of the owner, the business collects the death benefit from the policy and uses it to "buy the owner out" by making a liquidation payment to his or her estate, as shown in this hypothetical example:¹

If your business is a C corporation, the receipt of death benefits may increase the corporation's liability for the Alternative Minimum Tax. You should consult a tax professional about your unique circumstances.

Talk to your financial professional about how life insurance can be an important part of your business-continuation strategy.

An employer-owned life insurance policy may be subject to the requirements of Internal Revenue Code 101(j) in order to obtain an income-tax-free death benefit. In general those rules require that before the policy is issued, the employer must provide the insured with a written notice of the life insurance and obtain a written consent from the insured. Consult with an attorney for application of those rules to a specific situation.
